All that is left of this 18th century house is a brick cellar and four partly stuccoed and plastered walls of the first and second floors. In the mid-19Century the building was raised to two and one-half storys, the floor levels were changed and the east-west gable roof was built with brackets, giving the house an Italianate appearance. At this time the floor plan was changed to the present south stairhall and north parlour. At one time two story additions covered the south side and the south end of the west side. There was a hip roofed porch across the east side.

The cellar is entered by an arch through the chimney block on the west side. The north leg of this arch forms part of an east-facing chimney base, while the south leg is the triangular base for a southwest-facing corner chimney. This suggests an original two room floor plan. Two cellar lights on the east each have nine square vertical bars set diagonally in plan, and have three centered arches rising into the watertable on the exterior.

The brickwork on the east is Flemish bond and on the south, 3:1 common bond. The original door and window openings have been altered. The east gable end has a door with transom and sidelights on the south leading into the hall. Also there are two 6/6 sash windows on the first floor. There are three 6/6 sash windows on the second floor and two 4/2 sash windows in the upper half story. The windows and door have crude jack arch heads. On the north side there are two windows on the first floor and two on the second.

The rebuilt chimney has a small fireplace on the first floor and stove flues on the upper floors. On the second floor there are two bedrooms over the parlour, and a walk-in closet with shelves at the east end of the stairhall. The single attic room sits over the space of the two bedrooms and closet combined. The attic door, with six deep panels, may be the only surviving woodwork from the original house.

The mouldings are quirk ogee with champher and Greek ovold. The interior architraves are flat beaded boards with corner blocks.

The house is in ruins.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE (Include Personages, Dates, Events, Etc.)

This farmhouse, located near the Bay, is an interesting product of 19th century remodeling of an 18th century brick house. It appears that the building had a "hall and parlour" plan originally, however, this should be re-checked to determine if it indeed had such a plan. Possibly it bears some similarity to Lostock in its original form?!

The remodeled building is also of interest because it is a good example of a late 19th century Italianate house. Unlike most of this period which were built from scratch, the form of this differs due to the fact that part of the base is earlier. It at one time had a porch across its facade and a large addition on its south side.
